

The invention provides methods for diagnosing cancer including colon cancer, based on the identification of certain colon cancer-associated polypeptides as antigens that elicit immune responses in colon cancer. The identified antigens can be utilized as markers for diagnosing colon cancer, and for following the course of treatment of colon cancer.